Helping Reluctant Readers

A study published a while back and reported in The Teaching Times claimed that 42% of children have lost interest in reading by the age of 11.

If that's true it's incredibly sad. Blame is apportioned to politicians, teachers, the TV and internet, but blame doesn't achieve anything. Instead, as parents what can we do to encourage our children to engage with literature? Try these great tips to engage reluctant readers.

Let them see you reading! It sounds obvious but it works. Read some funny bits from your own book aloud to them, or try an interesting newspaper article.

Schedule a small part of the day for reading. It doesn't even have to be them reading. My ten-year-old son still loves me to read to him... especially when I put on accents and voices to suit the characters. Lose your inhibitions and have fun with reading and your children will follow suit.

Try a joke book or nonsense poetry books. Kids love jokes and rhymes, the sillier the better. They won't even realise they are reading as they regale you with their new-found anecdotes and ditties.

Use the power of movies. My ten-year-old really engaged with reading when he saw the first Harry Potter movie. He read the book straight afterwards and realised how much richer in detail it was compared with the film. From then on he was hooked.

Summer Days Out

Here are a few ideas for some great days out this Summer

Why not try something a bit daring at one of the UK's outdoor adventure centres? Award winning Go Ape! Courses have sprung up all round Britain. They are high wire forest courses containing rope bridges, tarzan swings and zip slides up to 40 feet in the trees. Other outdoor pursuit centres offer the chance to try out water sports, abseiling, climbing, quad biking and many more activities.

If you are looking for adrenaline of a different kind, you could visit a theme park. Alton Towers, Blackpool Pleasure Beach and Thorpe Park are some of the largest and best known, but there are many others. Try to do some research before you go, to check that the park you are planning to go to has suitable rides for your party. Height restrictions often apply, and some focus on gentler rides for younger children, whilst others major on scary thrill rides. Some have other attractions in addition to the rides and have links with popular brands, such as Thomas Land at Drayton Manor Park and Legoland offering rainy day guarantees.

Or you could take a trip to one of Britain's castles. Some are presented in a very simple traditional manner, whilst others include animated wax work displays and regular events involving jesters, jousting and an opportunity to try your hand at swordsmanship. A visit to a castle can provide the opportunity to learn about history, and many will enjoy the now popular audio guides that are often provided. Some like Alnwick Castle have more recent history to thank for increased popularity. This glorious medieval castle has been the setting for many great films, including Harry Potter.

Perhaps some animal magic would make your day more enjoyable. Britain has lots of great zoos where you can see a huge variety of animals and get an insight into the importance of conservation. Longleat and The West Midlands Safari Park are also long established favourites and offer the opportunity to drive past animals in larger more natural settings. There are lots of farm attractions too where you can feed the animals, hold chicks and lambs, as well as learning about farming. Monkey Forest at Trentham is one of the UK's newer animal attractions. Others which have a focus on one type of animal include falconry centres, the donkey sanctuary, sealife centres and butterfly farms.
